February 11, 2017

Sirians Leave Out Information in Their Stories
My family went to see Lion (2016 film) this afternoon. The film, with stars Dev Patel, Rooney Mara, David Wehham and Nicole Kidman, is based on the non-fiction book A Long Way Home which is the real-life story of Saroo Brierley who was separated from his mother at age 5 and adopted by an Australian couple.

When my family members got home, I searched for a photo of Saroo Brierley and found the following images:
In July 2013, I began to notice celebrities making cross-arm gestures in photographs, see: http://articles.x10.mx/photos.html

Note: Enki and other members of the Ennead are Major Race members. Dowsing helps me to understand that ninety-five percent of celebrities are Sirian.

Other Stories With Missing Information
Chris Gardner, whose homelessness is portrayed in the film The Pursuit of Happyness (2006), has been photographed with a cross-arm gesture that is identical to Saroo Brierley:

Gardner published his autobiography on May 23, 2006 and worked as an associate producer on the film. Actor Will Smith played Gardner and Will’s son Jaden played Gardner’s son Christopher.
In 2008, actress Emma Thompson introduced her adopted refugee son at Nelson Mandela’s 90th birthday party in London. His name is Tindyebwa Agaba and she met him at a Refugee Council event when he was 16.

In 2015, I had so many photographs of Sirians gesturing what I call a left-hand cross-arm pose, I began to organize them on a Web page, see: http://articles.x10.mx/photos.html

For about a year, I thought that famous people who gestured a right-hand cross arm pose were Major Race members. Today, I realize that only about 10 percent of those who gesture a right-hand pose are actually Major Race members. Most are Sirian. Posting photos in alphabetical order is time consuming and I have not updated the page that I started in 2015.